The U.S. government is known for its need for secrecy, and that extends to its employees and contractors as well. Specifically, the agency has a habit of asking contractors, such as Adobe, to sign internal nondisclosure agreements (NDAs)Â—secretive contracts that prohibit, among other things, the disclosure of certain information related to work the contractor's doing for the government. In some cases, this prohibition extends beyond the contractor's work and to the contractor's family. Nondisclosure agreements are often signed for years, and some contractors have signed them for 20 years.

Assuming the new policy helps cover Adobe's ass, it also gives the company a fun little loophole—and one that more companies will probably use. Adobe Photoshop is one of the world's best tools for creating high-resolution images of scanned documents, and if a company is willing to spend the time and money to scan the documents in the first place, it may make sense to place the NDA with the scanner's maker, rather than Adobe, the person who will actually use the resulting imagery.

Because the government doesn't break the NDA when a contractor is paying to do the government's work, the company could send those it contracts with a strict 30-day nondisclosure agreement and say all is well.

If you are interning for a company that uses Photoshop, you should have a document containing all the files and trademarks of the company so that you don't chance infringing its rights or stealing its intellectual property. Adobe Photoshop also has an easy and an advanced way of sharing an image or a document with a friend so that you can get a new use out of it.
